FAUNTLEROY IN DIFFICULTIES.

A Newshy Who Could Not Stand Dudes Frees His Youthful Mind.

A number of passengers about to cross the bridge from Brooklyn witnessed an amusing scene the other day.

A gentleman who had just purchased a ticket in gathering his change from the ticket seller's window fell from his hand a quantity of coins—cents, nickels and dimes. They scattered in all directions over the muddy pavement.

A little urchin of a newsboy, from whom the gentleman had bought a paper for which he had not yet paid, went to the rescue of the truant coin.

At almost the same moment another little fellow clad in the familiar costume of a little Lord Fauntleroy—leather leggings, gloves, long hair and all—hove in sight. He was accompanied by a fashionably attired lady, evidently his mother.

Human nature is very strong in a boy, even a Lord Fauntleroy. Espying a dime the newcomer forgot the dignity of his exalted rank. He stooped down and with his diminutive hand picked from the muddy pavement the coin, which he promptly pocketed.

The tatterdemalion saw the act and made a grab for Fauntleroy, who clung to his mother's skirts. "Wadler doin' wid de god's money?" he said. "Doncher know no better den to steal?"

The mother of the little aristocrat was dreadfully shocked at seeing her offspring in the dirty hands of the newsboy. She flew to the rescue. "Take your hands off my child," she said, "or I'll have you arrested, you young scoundrel."

"I ain't no scoundrel," said the gamin, dropping his hands and releasing the little lord. "Mako yer kid give up de money," he continued. "He ain't got no right ter keep it."

Little Fauntleroy was pleased enough to be released from the clutches of the two begrimed little hands of the newsboy. He gave up the money readily enough, and with his mother, who had brushed the dirt off the miniature box-coat sleeves, he hastened on his way to New York to make a society call. The newsboy watched the retreating forms contentiously.

"Say, boss," he said, returning to the gentleman, who had watched the affair with interest, and yet had been unable to take any part in it so rapidly had the entire scene been over.

"Say, boss," continued the boy, "dat young feller wold 'a looked yer money but for me. Ahn't yer goin' to give me a dime?"

The gentleman told him that he might keep the money.

"Tanks," said the urchin. "I tell yer," he added, "Dree young Fauntleroy an' sailors wid long hair, dey makes me a fiddler. I guess dey'll steal sooner den a newsboy. I ain't got no use for fellers like dat. Dey don't have no fun, an' my! how dey gets licked by us fellers when we gets de chance. Dey gets licked, too, if dey gets a spot on de chest dey wears. Yer can bet I'd sooner be a newsboy, 'nora dude wid long hair wot gets licked for nothin'."

The gentleman continued his trip over the bridge. He has been debating since the occurrence, however, if there was not a great deal of truth in the newsboy's rude philosophy.—New York Herald.

Wasting Illustrated Papers.

Calling at the room of a bachelor friend of mine the other night I was horrified to see him light his fire of birchwood with a copy of the London News or some other illustrated paper. These things should always be given away instead of destroyed, and a society exists for that very purpose. I tried to set before my heartless burner of "pictures papers" the amusement that some child in a hospital, for example, might derive from the leaves that he had put to the base use of "kindlings."

It is related, I remember, of a certain great writer that he could not bear to see destroyed any piece of paper that carried printed words, and consequently might go quite so far as that, but I may truly say that the destruction of a picture always gives me a slight pang in some unascertained part of my anatomy.—Boston Post.

Why Man Stands on the Right.

The rubric in the prayer book, which was added by Bishop Cosin, directs that the man shall stand on the right hand and the woman on the left hand—that is, the man on the right hand of the woman, and the woman on the left hand of the man, as if it were in the Salisbury Manual. The reason given is a very fanciful one—viz., because the rib out of which the woman was formed was taken out of the left side of the man. Another reason is that the right hand is the most useful.

It is therefore, both by the Latin and the Greek, and all Christian churches, assigned to the man as being head of the wife.

The Jews, however, otherwise, placing the woman on the right hand of her husband, in allusion to that expression in the forty-fifth Psalm, "At thy right hand did stand the queen in gold of Ophir." Another reason given is that this position is the most convenient for a man has to take the ring and the woman's fourth finger of the woman.
